

I am against any relaxation of media ownership rules that would allow further consolidation of mainstream media (television, radio, newspaper) in major urban markets. I feel it's in the public interest to maintain some degree of separation of media interests serving a community even if it means inefficiencies within and between those interests. After all, the costs are simply passed on to the consumer more or less equally. Relaxing the current rules will make reversing them in case of failure virtually impossible.